Let's take a look at what her role was in the military and whether Sandra Westgate from Masters of the Air is a real historical person. Plus, meet the actor who plays her on the show.Spoiler Warning: This article includes spoilers for Masters of the Air episode 6, so proceed with caution.Who Is Sandra Westgate in Masters of the Air? Credit: Playtone | Amblin Television | Apple StudiosThe introduction of Sandra Westgate (played by Bel Powley) adds a light-hearted moment for Major Harry Crosby (played by Anthony Boyle), who is still reeling from the loss of his best friend, Bubbles Payne (played by Louis Greatorex).Spending a week at Oxford, Harry is told that his roommate is a subaltern. Unfortunately, he struggles to pronounce the word properly, which he has to repeat several times.When he finally meets Sandra, he already knows how to pronounce her job title correctly.The two become close as Sandra comforts him over his struggle to accept Bubbles' death. It also gives Harry a chance to step away from Thorpe Abbotts, even just for a few days.RELATED: What Happened to Bubbles at the End of Masters of the Air Ep 5? Credit: Playtone | Amblin Television | Apple StudiosIn the show, Sandra doesn't disclose what her job is. But we learned that a subaltern is part of the British Army with a rank below a captain's. This is comparable to the US Army, which calls this role a First or Second Lieutenant. Basically, subalterns are junior officers.During the war, women who served in the British Auxiliary Territorial Service were given a subaltern or second subaltern rank. The regular military ranks were later adapted for women in the 1950s.So, what do subalterns do? They were significant individuals who had various jobs within the British Army.READ MORE: What Is the Meaning of Flak Happy in Masters of the Air?Is Sandra Westgate a Real Person? Meet the Actress Who Plays Helen Powered by Reelgood Masters of the Air is a show about real-life heroes. The Apple TV+ series is about the men and women, but mostly men, who sacrificed all to defeat the Nazis during World War II. It’s also a show that attempts to show us the nuanced, emotional sides of these people whose exploits might otherwise make them seem like myths. Masters of the Air Episode 6 seemingly makes this its primary focus. After the disaster over Munster in last week’s episode, Robert “Rosie” Rosenthal (Nate Mann) and his crew find themselves sent to a psychological rehab facility, while grieving Group Navigator Harry Crosby (Anthony Boyle) is sent to a conference for Allied soldiers in Oxford. What Crosby doesn’t expect there is to find that his roommate, subaltern A. M. Wesgate, is actually a woman: Alessandra “Sandra” Wesgate (Bel Powley). While she cleverly remains mum on her work for the British army — joking at one point that she is a “punter” — it’s clear she’s someone important, probably in intelligence. The two kick off a lovely, flirtatious friendship in Oxford that culminates in a bittersweet dance. From the moment that Sandra and Crosby meet, she points out that there should be no issue with them rooming together as he is married. We haven’t met “Mrs. Jean Crosby,” but we’ve read her letters. Between Jean’s absence and the incendiary chemistry actors Powley and Boyle have, I couldn’t help but kind of, sort of want them to have an affair. But that would be wild, right? And mean to Mrs. Jean Crosby. So why am I rooting for Bel Powley and Anthony Boyle’s Masters of the Air characters to hook up?? Masters of the Air is Apple TV+’s epic World War II series, made in the vein of Band of Brothers and The Pacific. (Tom Hanks and Steven Spielberg have executive produced all three.) The Apple TV+ show specifically follows the men of the 100th Bomb Group, nicknamed the “Bloody Hundredth” because of their insanely high casualties. One of the few men to survive his time with the group was navigator Harry Crosby. He would go on to write a memoir about his experiences called A Wing and a Prayer: The “Bloody 100th” Bomb Group of the US Eighth Air Force in Action Over Europe in World War II. That book, along with Donald L. Miller’s Masters of the Air: America’s Bomber Boys Who Fought the Air War Against Nazi Germany, serves as the source material for the show. Photo: Apple TV+ Now I say all this because it’s important to remember that Harry Crosby was a real person. He and his beloved wife Jean would be together for the rest of their lives. They were incredibly involved with their church and community. By all accounts, they had a happy marriage. And I want to stress, they had a real marriage. And yet — and yet! — I really want the TV show version of Harry Crosby to break his marriage vows and hook up with the sassy subaltern Sandra. The way I see it, this is all Bel Powley and Anthony Boyle’s faults. From the moment that Sandra arrives onscreen, stumbling in on an undressed Cros practicing his best Spencer Tracy in the mirror, Masters of the Air transforms into something akin to a scintillating rom-com. Sandra is snappy, confident, and full of sly jokes that tiptoe into innuendo. Crosby is at first slightly unmoored by her, but he soon finds himself drawn deeper into her orbit. Watching Powley and Boyle banter off each other feels like a heavenly hybrid between the classic and the modern. They’ve got the sizzle of screwball comedy duos with the unspoken respect that contemporary platonic buddies share. More importantly, Sandra is the first real friend Crosby has had to talk to in the wake of his bestie Bubbles’s (Louis Greatorex) death. Jean might happily send her husband weekly letters from the homefront, but it’s clear from her chipper post-scripts that she has no idea of the horrors her husband has endured. Sandra does. And because of that, the two can talk plainly about the situation (even if Sandra refuses to spill the beans on her top secret work). By the end of Masters of the Air Episode 6, Sandra and Crosby have established an emotional intimacy, leaving the little romantic weirdo in me hungry for more. I want more jokes about punting, more shirtless Spencer Tracy impressions, more waltzes at Oxford parties, and more Bel Powley and Anthony Boyle bouncing off of each other. If Masters of the Air didn’t want me to root for these two, then they shouldn’t have made them so intoxicating to watch together. The eight-episode National Geographic series tells the true story of Miep Gies (Powley), who played a critical role in hiding Anne Frank and her family from the Nazis. 20-something secretary Gies didn’t hesitate when her boss Otto Frank (Schreiber) asked her to hide him and his family during World War II. For the next two years, Miep, her husband Jan (Cole) and several other everyday heroes watched over the eight souls hiding in the secret annex. It was Miep who found Anne’s diary and preserved it so that she and Otto could later share it with the world. The series title comes from a quote by Gies late in her life: “I don’t like being called a hero because no one should ever think you have to be special to help others. Even an ordinary secretary or a housewife or a teenager can turn on a small light in a dark room.” Powley most recently appeared in the Apple drama series “The Morning Show” and will also star in the upcoming Apple World War II drama “Masters of the Air.” She is also known for her roes in films like “Diary of a Teenage Girl,” “The King of Staten Island,” and “Carrie Pilby.” She is repped by Curtis Brown, UTA and Jackoway Austen Tyerman. Schreiber led the Showtime series “Ray Donovan” for seven seasons in the title role. The series officially concluded with “Ray Donovan: The Movie” in January 2022. Schreiber also previously starred in the World War II film “Defiance,” which told the true story of the Bielski brothers, Polish Jews who helped save other Jews and fight the Nazis. His other film roles include “X-Men Origins: Wolverine,” “The Sum of All Fears,” “The Manchurian Candidate,” and “Spotlight.” He is repped by Untitled and UTA. Cole recently had a memorable turn in the first season of “Gangs of London” and is also known for his role in “Peaky Blinders.” He previously starred in an episode of “Black Mirror” and starred in films such as “A Prayer Before Dawn,” “Green Room,” and “Thank You for Your Service.” He is repped by B-Side Management and WME. The series will begin production this summer in Prague and Amsterdam. Joan Rater and Tony Phelan serve as wrtiers, executive producers, and showrunners. Susanna Fogel will direct multiple episodes, including the pilot, and executive produce. Peter Traugott of Keshet Studios will also executive produce. ABC Signature will produce in partnership with Keshet Studios. There’s no denying The Morning Show season 2 has a stacked cast. From big-name actors from season 1 like Jennifer Aniston, Reese Witherspoon, and Steve Carell to new characters played by Emmy winner Julianna Margulies and Russian Doll star Greta Lee, it’s one of the most star-studded ensembles on TV.However, fans may be wondering where a few season 1 favorites are this season. Discover where pivotal season 1 actors like Gugu Mbatha-Raw and Bel Powley have disappeared to during The Morning Show season 2.Why isn’t Hannah Shoenfeld in The Morning Show season 2?Hannah Shoenfeld was a key player in The Morning Show season 1. An up-and-coming talent booker for the show, Hannah was intelligent, ambitious, and riveting. Gugu Mbatha-Raw got wide acclaim for her performance, as she was nominated for prestigious accolades like the Gold Derby TV and Black Reel Television Awards and won Artist of Distinction at the Newport Beach Film Festival.Unfortunately, you won’t see Mbatha-Raw in The Morning Show season 2 due to her character’s tragic end in the season 1 finale. Shaken by Mitch’s assault and traumatized by the network’s reaction to it, Hannah died due to a drug overdose.Will we see Hannah Shoenfeld in The Morning Show season 2? Due to her death, we likely will not see her again unless it’s through flashbacks. However, her family’s wrongful death lawsuit is a big storyline this season.Why isn’t Claire Conway in The Morning Show season 2?Bel Powley in “The Morning Show,” now streaming on Apple TV+.PA Claire Conway was another major part of The Morning Show season 1, especially when it came to her secret relationship with weatherman Yanko Flores. Actor Bel Powley also received rave reviews for her portrayal, winning the Breakout Honoree distinction at the Newport Beach Film Festival.But we haven’t seen Powley in season 2, either. The combination of her complex relationship with Yanko, as well as the devastation from finding Hannah’s body, was ultimately too much for Claire. In season 2, we find out that Claire quit the show and moved back to England.Will we see Claire Conway in The Morning Show season 2? Though there’s no word on if we’ll ever see Claire again, we’re not ruling it out completely. It would be interesting to see her and Yanko reunite, especially since he’s been going through some major struggles this season.Why isn’t Jason Craig in The Morning Show season 2?Jason Craig, played by Jack Davenport, is Alex Levy’s ex-husband. Though the pair were married for several decades, they ultimately drifted apart, and many of those years they stayed together solely to keep up public appearances.Alex is in a much different place this season, first moving to the country and then struggling to come to terms with Maggie’s book, which may explain why we haven’t been seeing her ex.Will we see Jason Craig in The Morning Show season 2? Though there’s been no official confirmation about whether he’ll be back, we wouldn’t be surprised if he made an appearance. Maggie’s book promises to shake things up for Alex in more ways than one, and once the news about her and Mitch breaks, it would make sense for her to have to reckon with her ex-husband.Do you hope to see any of these characters return? Comment below! Masters of the Air's heroes have been grounded this week. Major Gale Cleven (Austin Butler) is missing in action, John Egan (Callum Turner) is trapped in a prisoner of war (POW) camp, and Harry Crosby is off to Oxford University for an Allied nations meeting. Even our new favorite Masters of the Air pilot—Robert "Rosie" Rosenthal (Nate Mann)—is on a forced vacation, since he was the only pilot to return from the crew's latest mission. Entering episode 6 of the series, nothing is looking good for the Bloody 100th's bombardiers, but the war is about to take a hopeful turn.Enter stage right: Gale Cleven. He's alive! We see Cleven swing around the fence to greet Egan at the POW camp. "What the hell took you so long?" he asks. At long last, our boys are back together. Cleven reportedly said this line to Egan in real life, which only makes their reunion that much better. At the time, Egan replied, "That's what I get for being sentimental!" When Hollywood tells stories based on true events, truth-bending usually ensues—but Cleven and Egan really had that kind of relationship.The boys now find themselves at Stalag Luft III, a POW camp where many of the Bloody 100th's pilots landed after they were shot down over Münster and Bremen, Germany. A new set of challenges awaits them, but the attention of the Apple TV+ series returns to the home front in episode 6. Sentimentality, begone! It's time for some R&R. Robert Viglasky//AppleRosie wants to return to the fight!Some of the mission's surviving crew members are suffering from intense guilt, so they're ordered to rest in the English countryside. Rosenthal, the hero of Münster, is among them. He's a bit antsy, however, because he would rather remain in combat than relax and debrief with doctors. For audiences, this is where we learn a little bit more about Rosenthal. Hailing from Brooklyn, NY, one of the pilot's greatest motivations was his Jewish heritage. Understanding the threat posed by the Nazi regime, he saw a moral obligation to join the war effort. Like a jazz drummer forced to quit mid-solo, Rosenthal feels out of rhythm in the countryside. But with the help of an on-site therapist and his comrades, Rosenthal realizes that he's in charge of the rhythm of his crew as well. If Rosenthal is going to take the next step as the Bloody 100th's last remaining hero in the sky, he needs a clear mind. One of his fellow crewmen tells the group, "Hearing his voice on the radio, that was the first time that I didn't feel scared shitless."Robert Viglasky//AppleOur boys are back!But not everyone in the Bloody 100th's ranks is operating with a steady mind. While in Oxford, Harry Crosby spends his time flexing in the mirror and fraternizing with a colleague across the pond named A.M. Wesgate (Bel Powley). It's a perplexing plot about Crosby attempting to cheat on his wife while abroad at war, but the lieutenant is unsuccessful. After some drinks in his room, Crosby fumbles the bag and wallows in the loss of his fallen friends. "That's why they sent me here," he tells her. "Give me some time away." When we return to Masters of the Air next week, hopefully our boys will be well-rested (and reunited!) for the big fight ahead. It's 1943, after all—the war is far from over.
